SCOTT'S SCRAP BOOK

Uncle Ray's Corner

Poor Clothing Worried Jack London During Boyhood

AS WE study the lives of great authors, we find that they have labored long and hard before giving the world important books. Often a writer of such a volume has himself gone through deep suffering.

Surely Jack London was no exception to the rule. San Francisco was the birthplace of this boy. As a youth he was, for a time, a homeless wanderer, but he stored in his mind a wealth of experience and put his adventures into books.

As soon as he was able to do so, Jack took on a newspaper route and in that way earned a small sum to help pay household expenses. The family had moved across San Francisco bay to Oakland when Jack was small, and it was in Oakland that he was sent to school.

In school Jack proved he had a special talent in writing compositions. When graduation from grade school approached, he was asked to be the "class historian." A youthful worry about his poor clothing led him to refuse the honor, and for the same reason he stayed away from the graduation exercises. After leaving school, he earned what part of his living he could. While employed at an Oakland factory, he was paid ten cents an hour.

The lad's chief interest soon was centered on boats and salt water. There was no such wondrous thing as an ocean voyage for him at that time, but he obtained a small skiff and fitted it with a sail. Using the skiff for fishing, he made trips to various parts of San Francisco bay.

At the age of 17, Jack took part in one of the great adventures of his life. He obtained a place as an able-bodied seaman aboard the "Sophie Sutherland," a sealing vessel bound for waters around the western end of Alaska.

A happy day it was when he traveled the broad Pacific, aboard the schooner with sails full to the wind. Each task which was given him, he performed with a will. Among the sailors on board were rough men, who were ready to quarrel, and more than once he had to defend himself with his fists. Although young, he was strong, and before long the sailors learned to let him alone. Several among them became his good friends.

Reaching the islands where seals were to be found, the men set to work capturing as many as possible. Jack did his full part. He knew that a large haul of seal skins would earn him more money at the end of the voyage.
