This cearie fellow is Ted Osborne, and in private life he's not such a bad chap at alf—you know, kind to children, animals, his family and all that sort of thing. But, brother, you wouldn't care to meet some of the characters he introduces on "Suspense." Columbia network's Tuesday series of spinechillers, if you chanced to stroll into some dark alley on a moonless night.

Thoughtful Wife Cheered Hawthorne's Lonely Spirit

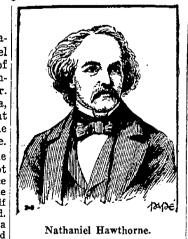

WHEN he visited the Peabody home, Nathaniel Hawthorne met the sister of the young woman who had invited him to come to see her. The sister was named Sophia, and when Hawthorne caught sight of her, he had a hard time taking his eyes from her face.

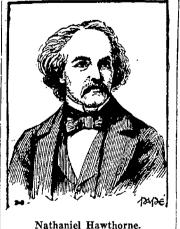

Sophia Peabody at that time was an invalid, and could not leave her own home, but her face seemed noble and beautiful to the The meeting will be preceded by interest in the study of Lincoln writer who had kept himself a 6:30 p. m. public dinner, and will and of places where he lived and penned away from the world. penned away from the world. There was in his own mind a memory of years in his boyhood when, after injuring his leg, he had been confined to his home.

The friendship grew, and Nathaniel and Sophia became engaged. Sophia said, however, that the engagement must not turn into marriage until her health became so good that she no longer would be an invalid. Perhaps a deep love proved better than the doctor's medicine. At any rate, three years after the engagement, she was well and the marriage took place. Meanwhile Hawthorne had decided to go out into the real world, and to work at tasks other than writing. He obtained a place with a salary of $100 a month at the Boston Custom House. There he labored hard, weighing coal and other goods which sea-going vessels brought into the port.

Fourteen months later, Hawthorne gave up his work at the port and entered upon farm work. He joined Charles A. Dana and others in forming a little village tion at the Salem Custom House, written several new books, and "The Old Manse" were good ones. and there he lived with his besons in the village did their share loved wife in a house known as with the public. Yet he still a happiness of spirit to him which

Nevertheless, his four years at of work. Hawthorne often got up "The Old Manse." Some years thought of himself as "the world's he had not known before, and at four o'clock in the morning to before, another great writer, least-read author." In his free opened the way for his great suc-
