Uncle Ray's Corner

A PERSON might suppose that the "golden eagle" would be the one with its image on gold pieces of the United States. Actually it is the bald eagle, not the golden, which has been honored in that way.

The bald eagle is about the same size as the golden eagle, but has a slightly larger wing-spread. Sometimes the female has a wingspread of almost eight feet. The male spreads his wings to the extent of seven feet or a bit more.

If you look for an eagle which is really bald, you will have a hard time finding one. Bald eagles were given their name because their white heads suggested baldness to observers in the past. The head and neck are covered with white feathers, which are in contrast with the brown color of the wings and body.

Bald eagles are North American birds and are not native to other continents. This largely explains why the bald eagle was chosen, back in 1782, as a national emblem of the United States.

Although they are rare in many parts of the continent, bald eagles have far-flung nesting habits. They make their homes from Canada and Alaska southward to Mexico and Florida. They like places which are near lakes, rivers or ocean coasts.

The bald eagle also is called the "white-headed eagle" and the "American eagle." Most often it builds its nest in tall trees, at a height of from 20 to 100 feet above the ground. In some cases, however, it chooses a niche in the face of a cliff for its nest.

A pair of eagles may use the same nest year after year. If they escape their enemies, bald eagles are likely to live to a ripe old age, perhaps for as much as a century.

Two eggs usually are laid during each nesting season. Now and then a third egg is laid, but that is not at all common. The eggs are about three inches long and a bit more than two inches wide.

Bald eagles kill and eat small animals such as rabbits and snakes, but they seem to like fish better than any other food. One of their old customs is to let another bird, the osprey, fish for them. After capturing a fish, the osprey is attacked by the eagle and is forced to drop its fish. Then the eagle dives and may catch the fish before it touches the water.

The nests are made of sticks, often from two to three inches thick, along with roots, seaweed, grass, and other material. In Florida a favorite lining of the nest is marsh grass. Many of the Florida nests are from four to six feet wide, and from three to six feet high.

A bald eagle watches an osprey fish, then takes away the fish!
