In most of his poems he used this "dialect" and by that means spread knowledge of it.

Riley stayed in Indianapolis after the appearance of his first book. He kept on writing poems, and as time went on they were gathered and placed in new books. Slowly, with the passing years Riley became known far beyond the limits of Indiana. His books were sold widely, and the time came when he could be ranked as "a famous poet." An 18-year-old girl in Chicago read some of Riley's poems, and was deeply pleased by them. She had just become one of the editors of a small weekly paper, and she sent Riley $25, asking him to send her that much worth of poetry.

Riley promptly prepared a poem and sent it to the young lady whose name was Clara Laughlin She was very happy when the poem arrived, and it was published in her paper as "a great fea-
