Where Mother MILKS a TREE by TAPPING it!
Cow Tree Provides "Milk" for Natives and Travelers
JUDGING by their names, certain trees could provide us with a meal of a common, everyday type. We might have bread from the breadfruit tree, sausage from the sausage tree, butter from the butter tree and milk from the cow tree!
The fact is that not all of those trees are as good as their names. The sausage tree, for example, fails to provide ready-made sausages for people to pick! The fruits look like sausages, but they do not taste like the sausages we buy at a meat market.
Breadfruit trees come close to living up to their name. The fruit can be baked and turned into a valuable food. To a large extent this fruit takes the place of bread on islands of the South Seas.
That there should be a "cow tree" is a freak of Nature. Yet there are trees known by that name, and they provide a kind of milk which people can drink.
Cow trees grow in the warmer parts of South America, also in Central America. One kind is found in New Zealand.
Let a person cut into the bark of a cow tree, and soon there will come flowing out a white juice which looks like milk. This juice can be caught in a glass or other container, and it makes a drink which tastes something like milk.
The milky juice of the cow tree is used in the regions where it grows. Foreign travelers as well as natives, have drunk it without suffering any ill effects.
If mixed with several parts of water, and boiled, the juice will rise to the top and can be skimmed off. The part skimmed from the top can be used in tea or coffee in much the same way as we add cream to those drinks.
The juice is a form of "latex," and if properly treated it will make a rubbery substance. Sometimes, after boiling, it is employed to caulk up the holes and cracks in boats.
Cow trees also have the name of "milk trees." They were first described to the outside world 145 years ago by Alexander von Humboldt, a scientist and writer.
The fruit of the cow tree is good to eat. It is sweet and pleasant tasting.
