Badgers Proved Fighting Skill in Days of "Badger-Baiting"

MANY thousands of badgers live on this continent, but people seldom see them. Their holes may be found on prairies and mountain sides, also about the edges of deserts, but the animals themselves are hard to locate.

There are two main reasons why badgers seldom are seen. One is the fact that they are nocturnal. They use the nights to hunt their food and spend most of their daylight hours inside their "dugout" homes.

The other main reason badgers are not often seen is that they are careful when they do wander from their holes. In twilight or moonlight, they watch out for enemies. They are tough little fighters, but they have enough sense to know that they are no match for men with rifles.

The badger has a gray coat of rather long hair or fur. There is a streak of white running from the nose up over the head. The gray coat matches the ground in some places, and this is still another thing which keeps them out of sight.

The western prairies of Canada and the United States are the favorite homes of badgers. In that region they do a good deal to keep down the number of pests. They feed on mice, gophers and prairie dogs.

A full-grown badger is usually a little more than two feet long, and weighs about 15 pounds. We may say that it is "built close to the ground." In other words, it has short legs.

Time and again badgers have proved their skill in fighting. In past times, when these animals were more common than today, the so-called sport of "badger-baiting" was carried on. A barrel was laid on the ground, and a captured badger was placed at the open end. Then it was attacked by one or more dogs. The badger always put up a brave fight. It was more than a match for a single dog, and sometimes fought off two or more dogs.

A young man once caught a badger by the tail and hind legs. If he had succeeded in capturing it alive, they might have been bitten for their pains. This animal has sharp teeth, and uses them when attacked.
