Remains of Ancient Times Exist at Syracuse, Sicily
YESTERDAY I spoke of a visit to Italy which I made before the outbreak of the present war. While I was there, I heard little about politics. If people liked Mussolini, they spent hardly any time talking about it to me. I had the idea that they felt pressed down by the Fascist rulers, but were afraid to talk about the subject. In Sicily I found a man who was willing to talk, at least to a certain extent. He was my guide while I was in the city of Syracuse in the southeastern part of the island.
"Mussolini came down here to give a talk," he said. "Several days before he arrived, he sent men to Syracuse to get people together and teach them to cheer. They had to practice a good deal before Di Duce came, so they would do the 'right' kind of cheering."
The same man, shortly before I boarded a boat to go to Malta, said to me, "We don't have any freedom anymore! Often, since then, I have thought of his words."
Syracuse was taken by the British Eighth army soon after the start of the United Nations invasion of Sicily. I am glad it was not badly battered before capture, not only for the sake of the people in it but also because it has interesting remains of the far past.
One day I visited an open air theater on the outskirts of Syracuse. There I saw stone seats which were used by people who went to the theater 2,300 years ago. Since no roof existed, the plays were given only when there was no rain. Another sight near Syracuse is the famous "Ear of Dionysus." This is a large hollow in the rock which may remind a person of an opening in a human ear. The hollow was cut long ago by workmen who were ordered to take out blocks of stone for building purposes.
Inside this ancient quarry is a place where the roof is 90 feet above the floor. It is possible to hear an echo there, a clear echo which comes when only a small noise is made. I spoke in a low voice, and the words came back in a moment. I clapped my hands, and the noise of the echo sounded almost like a clap of thunder.
