In northern Europe the Norsemen

spoke of the god Odin turning into an eagle at certain times.

The Persians of long ago used the eagle as a standard of war, but it was the Romans who made it best known for the purpose. Roman soldiers carried figures of eagles into battle. The eagles were shown with outstretched wings and were mounted on long poles.

Many hundreds of years later, the modern warrior named Napoleon took the old Roman eagle as his standard. He made the change in 1804 after he had won big victories. It seems that he looked on himself as a great conqueror, like Julius Caesar. As it turned out, his gilded eagles went down to defeat in Russia and at Waterloo.

Several other nations have made the eagle an emblem of one kind or another. Such emblems were used by the old Russian, German and Austrian empires. The white-
