swans of Europe and North America have white feathers.

The only swans with dark feathers are those which have their native homes south of the equator. Australia has black swans (with brownish-black feathers) and the southern end of South America has black-necked swans. Odd little stories are told about swans. An Englishman relates that he watched two female swans lay their eggs in the same nest, and that they took turns sitting on the eggs until the time of hatching. This plan, he adds, was followed by the two females for a period of three years.
