Uncle Ray's Corner
FLYING IN "V" FORMATION IS OLD GOOSE CUSTOM
LAST fall, while I was watching a football game, a good-sized flock of geese came flying over the field. There probably were 40 or 50 birds in the flock, and they formed a huge "V" in the sky.
Catching sight of the "V," the big Homecoming crowd set up a cheer. The "V" seemed a sign of victory. Whether the crowd was thinking mainly of winning the war or winning the game, it is hard to say.
Long before this war was started, wild geese flew in "V" formation. It is a custom of the goose world. An old gander commonly leads the flock, taking his place at the point of the "V."
Just when or why that formation was adopted by these birds is not known. We may note, however that men with guns find it harder to bring down geese on the wing than if they flew one straight behind another, or bunched-together.
The speed of geese is another help to save them from hunters. Often they fly at a rate of more than a mile a minute.
On this continent the Canada goose is the most common of the wild geese. It nests in many parts of Canada, as far north as the valley of the Yukon river. It also nests in some of the cooler parts of the United States.
The nest almost always is placed on the ground, but cases are known where Canada geese have nested in trees. These birds choose nesting sites which are out-of-the-way and hard for hunters to find.
One day a flock of geese flew over the New York zoo. They were on their way to the south to spend the winter.
In that zoo were a number of tame geese which were enjoying a meal of cracked corn. Nine of the wild geese came down to join the tame ones. In the sight of a keeper, they took their share of the corn.
With the help of more corn, the keeper coaxed seven of the wild geese inside a wire cage. Very shortly, their wings were clipped and they became regular members of the flock at the zoo.
The other two wild geese could not be coaxed into the cage, but stayed at the park through the winter, taking food which was tossed to them. In the spring these two flew northward and were not seen again.
