If a Chinese fails to shave, he may grow a thin mustache and scraggly beard, but he can hardly hope for more. Except in rare cases, the beard will grow to a length of only a few inches.

The hair of the head is another matter. It grows well on both men and women of China. It is black, Little, if any, hair is found and stays that way until old age,

In days of the Manchus, Chinese men were in the custom of letting their straight, black hair grow long and braiding it into "pigtails." The custom started when the Manchu invaders ordered all men to follow that plan. In 1912 a revolution in China forced the last Manchu ruler to give up his throne. The nation became a republic, and many changes were brought about. One of the new laws was meant to force the men to cut off their pigtails. Some of them had grown so used to this "decoration" that years passed before they would follow the new law.

In the southwestern part of China is a province known as Yunnan. It is the home of about 12,000,000 people, and some of them are known as "Lolos."

The Lolos have lighter skins than other Chinese, being almost white. It may be that they are a far branch of the white race. Young women among the Lolos take special pains when they dress their hair. Not content with the long hair they have, some of them mix in wool which has been dyed to match. A band over the head To explain those facts, we can holds the hair and wool in place. (For TRAVEL section of your
