Uncle Ray's Corner
at each end of a metal strip, and then the strip was bent so that the blades met.
Scissors of that kind seem to have been the first ever used. They have lasted down to the present day, but now we use them for cutting grass. The loop at the back is made of flexible steel, and this bends when the blades are pressed together. When the pressure is taken away, the blades go even line.
A seamstress would feel lost without scissors, and so would a tailor. In everyday life we need scissors for cutting paper.
Another important field of scissors has been in the cutting of hair. The Indians of this continent had no scissors, and had a hard time cutting their hair. When they did cut it, they often used the sharp edges of broken shells for the purpose. Think of the time it would take a barber to give us a modern-style haircut if he worked only with a sharp shell.
Today we have scissors of many types. One American factory has turned out more than 500 kinds. They range from tiny ones used in taking care of finger nails to large ones with blades more than a foot long. People usually call large scissors "shears."
The best grades of scissors are made of forged steel. Cheaper kinds are made of cast steel. Some scissors have forged steel cutting edges which are welded to steel or iron of a lower grade.
In closing let me make a note that some persons get mixed up on their verbs when they speak about scissors. The two blades make up a single cutting tool, but we should always say, "The scissors are..." and never "The scissors is..." Only when we speak of a "pair" of scissors can we properly use the verb "is."
