Selkirk Tamed Several Goats Found on Lonely Island

SEVERAL important things were put ashore with Alexander Selkirk when he was left on the lonely island in the South Pacific. These included a flintlock and a pound of gunpowder, a bag of bullets, a hatchet and a few books.

The island on which he found himself had roughly the shape of a triangle. It was 13 miles long, and the average width was about five miles.

Close to half the island was a rocky waste where few plants grew. The rest, however, had many trees along with shrubs and grass.

No other human being was on the island when Selkirk arrived, but people had been there in past times. A Spaniard named Juan Fernandez had discovered the island more than a century before, and had started a colony there. The members of the colony, after a short stay, had moved to Chile.

Selkirk was able to obtain several kids to start his flock of goats.

Hundreds of sailors had visited the island, and the British sea captain—William Dempier—had made a visit there. Selkirk found a space of more than two acres in which turnips grew. It is believed that these came from a garden which Dampier had planted several years before.

Also there were hundreds of wild goats. These may have been descended from tame goats left on the island by the early Spanish settlers.

Using his supply of powder, Selkirk shot some of the goats. He ate the meat, and turned the skins into clothing.

After killing mother goats, Selkirk was able to take several little goats back to the hut where he slept. There he made a pen for them, and waited for the kids to grow up.

While the kids were growing, he lived chiefly on turnips and the flesh of other goats which he shot. Before many months passed, his supply of powder ran out.

After much practice, Selkirk became an expert in running and in climbing about the rocks. Without powder for his flintlock, he now was able to capture wild goats simply by chasing them!
