Writer Faces Social Disease Ration Loss Kept Low Here

CHICAGO—(UP)—Mark Miller, Madison, Dane county, and Brownsville, Tex., who made an automobile trip from his home to Brainerd, Minn., to show it could be done despite gasoline rationing, was charged Tuesday with giving false statements to obtain special gasoline ration coupons.

Charges filed before W. M. McFarland, chief examining officer of the regional Office of Price Administration, claimed Miller also accepted gasoline without giving coupons to return.

Miller wrote an account of his trip which was published in a magazine under the title "Border to Border on Bootleg Gasoline."

According to the OPA, Miller received extra gasoline rations on his story that he had to travel to Oshkosh, Wis., to settle his mother's estate, go on to Cloquet, Minn., to refinance a mortgage, and return to Minneapolis to take a new job.

None of these statements was true, the OPA charged. On Aug. 14 when his trip ended, he possessed various loose T, C, and E coupons, although his car carried only an A sticker, the OPA claimed.

The hearing to suspend his gasoline rations was set for Dec. 16 at Brainerd.

Italians Have Excuse for Drying Macaroni in Public View

ANY soldiers of the United Nations are getting to see more macaroni and spaghetti than they ever saw before. I am thinking of the men who have gone into Italy to drive out the Germans.

Italy is the original home of macaroni, and the yellowish-white food product is a national dish among Italians. So far as the wheat supply has held out, it has been made all through the present war. The Italians have been on short rations, but macaroni has kept an important place on their tables, also spaghetti and vermicelli.

A special kind of wheat is used in making macaroni. This wheat has more gluten in it than most other wheat, and it is widely grown in southern Europe and Algeria. Now that sea routes are open between southern Italy and northern Africa, the supply of macaroni wheat should become better.

The wheat is ground, and the bran is taken out. Then water is added to the powdered wheat, and a dough is prepared. Macaroni-making machines press the dough into tubes. An old "spaghetti" means "little cord." Vermicelli is the thinnest member of the macaroni family. It comes from the machines in thread-like form.

Spaghetti is more popular with many Italians than macaroni. It is made in much the same way but is pressed from the machines so it comes out as a string or cord, instead of a tube. The word custom in Naples and some other Italian cities has been to hang the macaroni up to dry on wooden rods, in shops or even out on the edge of the sidewalk.

To handle macaroni in that way is to invite germs which are spread by flies or dust. The macaroni must be cooked before eating, but people in our land would rather have their macaroni come in boxes from a sanitary factory.

One excuse may be given for hanging macaroni in public view. If it is dried by hanging over a rod, Italians say it is a proof that it was made with the right kind of flour. When made of flour taken
