In the island of Ceylon, people sometimes speak about a king named Ravena. This man, they say, invented a musical instrument which had one string and was

Ceylon and India to this day have musical instruments of a very old type. These have a single string, and usually are played by Buddhist monks who go about begging for money. That instrument may not seem portant because it probably is one of the "ancestors" of the modern violin. It is believed to date back as much as 2,000 years. Four-stringed violins of the modern type were not known in Europe in ancient times. It seems that they grew directly from "gui-tar fiddles" and viols which were played during the Middle Ages. Travelers probably carried the bow and string idea from India to of the bow-and-arrow type. If that is the case, the violin bow, with its hundreds of long hairs, certainly has changed with the passing of time!

Certain cities in Italy grew famous for their violins in the period from 1600 to 1750. Among these cities were Venice and Cremona. Antonio Stradivari is the most famous violin-maker in history. Living in Cremona, he produced dozens of violins which became known for their rich and beautiful

Stradivari was born in-1644 and lived to the age of 93. Some of his violins still exist, and the most exact measurements of them have been made. Yet it seems that no
