KING HENRY VIII WORE SHOES WITH OPEN TOES

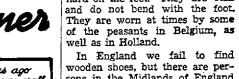

toed shoes may suppose they have something "modern," but old Henry VIII wore them long ago. That English king, a portly man who lived four centuries past, put on "slashed" shoes when he went forth to walk. These shoes gave his feet a bit of extra room, and it is suggested that they saved him from getting corns or bunions. We might go back even farther.

Sandals are open-toed shoes of a sort, with openings in other places as well as about the toes. Several thousand years have gone by since footwear of millions of people. given many persons the idea that sons in the Midlands of England who wear clogs. These are shoes with wooden soles but leather "uppers". The use of clogs is an old custom in the central part of the country, and is not a result of the present war.

When someone speaks of "boots," we are apt to think of rubber boots. Leather boots, however, were made long before rubber was discovered. A boot is simply an overgrown shoe, with an upper which goes up to the knee, or a good part of the way there.
