Firemen Now Use Ladders as High as 125 Feet

By using a telephone or a fire alarm box, we can call the fire department in a hurry. That is very different from what people did in olden times.

Running out of a burning house, a person would shout "Fire!" as loudly as he could. Those who heard him would take up the cry, and at last the news might reach some of the volunteer firemen in the town.

The firemen would rush to the engine house and wheel out a hand pump to rush to the fire. Most likely they would reach a burning house too late to save it, but they would turn the hose on the roofs of nearby houses and in that way might keep the fire from spreading.

The hose used a century and a half ago was of small diameter. It could send a half-inch stream of water to a low roof, but it did not amount to much.

Skyscrapers of the modern kind did not exist in the past century, but some hotels and other buildings were several stories high. Often a hotel had no outdoor fire escape, and people might be trapped on a floor far above the ground.

In one such case, in 1899, a woman screamed from the seventh story of a New York hotel. Sections were put together to make a high but shaky ladder. At great danger to his own life, a fireman reached the window where the woman was waiting.

The woman was carried to safety, but at one point a section of the shaky ladder seemed about to give way. After being saved, the woman said that the fireman ought to climb back to the seventh story to try to save her pet dog. The fire chief told her that human life was too valuable to risk it on such an errand.

Present-day firemen have excellent ladders which are carried to fires on motor trucks. Many of them are in sections which fold together. When necessary, they can be made to unfold by the use of springs, cranks or motor power. A sturdy ladder as high as 125 feet may be reased from a truck.

The aerial ladder, sometimes called "telescopic," is a great value in fighting fires in tall buildings. Some firemen who climb them have radio sets of the "walky-talky" kind. A man at the height of the tenth story of a building can talk to those on the ground much better with such a radio, or with a portable telephone, than by shouting.
