shape to "a barrel with both ends knocked out." It has no shell, and there are no bones inside its body.

The initials "BB" show where ocean water enters and leaves the Salpa. "C" shows position of heart and intestines.

Muscles reach around the salpo and make it possible for the anisame motion of the muscles brings Bits of is a small animal of the ocean. food are taken from the water, It grows to a length of four or five along with the oxygen needed for breathing. Salpas have spots on their bodies which look like eyes. There is a question as to whether these "eyes" give any power of seeing. If there is any sight at all from the "cyes," it is very small, perhans showing only the difference between light and darkness. Salpas like to live in the upper levels of the water, where there is sunlight in daytime. They are found at or near the ocean sur face. Because of their transparent podies, salpas are likely to be missed by a person who scans the sea Yet fishermen have picked up hundreds of them in a single net. Fishermen do not try to capture these animals, but often draw them in, along with fish. A kind of cord with "buds" on t may grow from the body of a salpa. The buds develop into new animals which are instead together in a string or chain. Thus they come to look like a snake several feet long.

The sulpas which come from such a chain lay eggs, but only one egg in each case. This egg grows into a new salpa which pro-separate salpa.
