ARMOR PLATE GUARDS ARMADILLOS WHICH ROLL INTO BALLS Turtles and shellfish are guarded by shells, but only one kind of Louisiana.

The armor plates are made of bone, and are very hard indeed. have a hard time running over the When an armadillo rolls up in a ball, only a large, strong animal ground, and it never could "curl can attack it with success,

South America is the chief home

bers of the family live in Central America and Mexico, A few have crossed the Rio Grande river and have set up homes in Texas and Armadillos differ a great deal in size. The smallest are only five inches long, not counting their tails. They are called "pink fairies" because their armor plates have a pink color, Parts of their bodies, not covered with bony plates, have white hair. All armádillos have at least a little fur, but the large ones have less fur, in proportion, then the pink fairles. Many of them are able to curl up in a ball, very much as a porcupine does. Then it is hard for an enemy to break through the armor, but pumas and jaguars can do it. In the forests of the Amazon valley, the giant armadillo is found. It is far from being a "giant" when compared with many other animals, but it is the largest mammal has its body covered with of all armadillos.
