Ostrich Eggs Cooked Over Open Fires by African Natives

If I asked you to name the largest egg in the world, you very likely would say, "The ostrich egg." That would be the right answer for the eggs of living birds. Yet there have been birds which laid larger eggs.

Our best records of "big egg birds" have come from New Zealand. In past times giant birds known as "moas" lived there. The last of them are believed to have died 800 years ago or more.

No white man ever has seen a moa, but their bones and feathers have been found, also some of their eggs.

Shells of moa eggs are pale buff or light yellow color. One of them, found in 1901, was seven and three-fourths inches long and five and one-quarter inches wide. Another moa egg was found with a length of 12 inches and a width of nine inches!

Moas laid the largest eggs of any birds known to have lived within the past few thousand years. In far distant times, however, certain birds laid larger eggs than any moa.

If we want a large egg today, we may be content with one from an ostrich nest. The contents of an ostrich egg equal what can be taken from two dozen hen's eggs! One of those big eggs would make quite a breakfast for any man!

Ostrich eggs are eaten by some of the natives of Africa. These dark-skinned folk search out a nest and rob it of its eggs, of which there may be as many as 10. Making a hole in one end of an egg, they set it upright on an open fire. Through the hole they thrust a stick, and stir the contents. In that way they "scramble" the egg as it cooks. Empty ostrich eggs have been used by African natives to hold water. As much as three pints of water may be carried in a single shell.

Back in the Stone Age in Europe, people did not keep chickens. It is believed, however, that Stone Age men often robbed the nests of birds and took the eggs to their caves for food.
