Uncle Ray's Corner

Young Sam Houston Lived Three Years Among Indians

Only one American state ever has been a "free and independent republic." That state is Texas, the largest state in the United States from the point of view of area.

Many men worked and fought to bring about the freedom of Texas from Mexico. Among them all there stood out one far above the others. His name was Sam Houston.

Houston was not born in Texas. He was a native of Virginia, his birth taking place in 1793 near the village of Lexington.

At about the time Sam reached the age of 13, his father died. After that blow came, the family was made up of the mother, six sons and three daughters.

Mrs. Houston decided to take her children to Tennessee. Sam, the youngest of the boys, joined his elder brothers in cutting logs and building a cabin about eight miles east of the Tennessee river. On the other side of that river lived the Cherokee Indians.

A space of land was cleared, and corn was planted along with vegetables. The Houstons thus took up the life of a pioneer family.

In that family Sam stood out as shrewd and hot-blooded. He did not like to have his older brothers tell him what to do. At length they got him a job as a clerk in a store in a nearby village. There, for a few weeks, he earned his wages, but he was far from content. One day he packed up his few articles of clothing and a book or two, and left the village.

Chief Took Him In

Instead of heading for his home, Sam made his way to the land of the Cherokees. Crossing the Tennessee river, he soon reached the lodging of one of the younger chiefs. This man agreed to take him in "as a son."

So it came about that Sam Houston, at about the age of 15, started to live among the Indians. He learned the Cherokee language and the warriors taught him many things about hunting. With them he made trips through the forests, and the Indians looked upon him as one of their own number.

Now and then Sam went back across the river to visit his family. Entering the village store he would buy presents for his mother and sisters.

Wanted to Pay Debts

Several of the gifts were charged to his account at the store, and this fact seems to explain his reason for giving up the wild life he had enjoyed for three years among the Indians. He decided to leave the Cherokees so he could teach school for a time and pay his debts.

Houston had learned to read and write as a boy in Virginia. In Tennessee he had read many books. Some persons would say that he was not fitted to become a teacher, but he did start a school and earned enough money to become "square with the world" again.

After that short period as a schoolmaster, young Houston might have returned to live among the Cherokees. Instead of doing so, he volunteered as an American soldier in the War of 1812. In the war he served under Andrew Jackson in fighting against the Creek Indians, and won the good will of the fiery general. At the close he was promoted to the rank of second lieutenant.

In 1818, Houston made a trip to Washington in the company of several chiefs of the Cherokee tribe. His plan was to help them get a money settlement for a treaty they had made, a treaty which carried a promise that they would give up some of their lands in Tennessee.

(Next Week: More About Houston.)
