Umbrellas of one kind or another have been known for more than 3,500 years, but it appears that they did not reach Great years ago, an Englishman named Thomas Coryate made notes about Britain until several years after Coryate wrote those notes. When they did get there, they were used at first only by women.

Some early umbrellas in England were covered with feathers. Others had silk tops, the silk being oiled so it would shed the

A British army officer paid a visit to Paris in 1752, and wrote a note saying that people there were in the custom of using "um-brellas in hot weather to defend themselves from the something of the same kind to defend themselves from snow and rain." The officer felt that Engishmen in general ought to take up the custom.

That military leader was brave enough to go to war, but it seems that he did not dare to carry an imbrella himself when he got back to London. It remained for a simple citizen to try to start a new fashion.

That citizen was Jonas Hanway.
