large as robins. The males have lozens of kinds of birds build greenish-black feathers on the body, but are brown about the bird eggs. Chipping sparrows, brown. suffer in this way.

What do the owners of the nests do when they find cowbird eggs? In some cases they "wall over" the egg or eggs, so their own eggs can be laid above. In other cases they simply hatch the cowbird eggs along with their ówn.

When a cowbird egg is hatched in a nest, the mother bird feeds the young cowbird along with her own young. The cowbird is likely to be larger than the others, and holds its mouth wider and higher. Thus it may be fed far more insects and worms, and may crowd the members of the true family. In one case a chipping sparrow had two of her own eggs in a nest, and one of a cowbird. Only one

Several other names are used for cowbirds. Some persons call them "cow blackbirds," others to a strange habit of these feathered creatures. The females are too lazy to build their own nests. They do not even warm their own eggs, but leave the work to other birds. They do not even warm their own eggs, but leave the work to other birds. They do not even warm their own eggs, but leave the work to other birds. They do not even warm their own eggs, but leave the work to other birds. They do not even warm their own eggs, but leave the work to other birds. They do not even warm their own eggs, but leave the work to other birds. They do not even warm their own eggs, but leave the work to other birds. They have relatives other birds. They have relatives of the lay-winged cowbirds," they dart around after insects which hover about the cows.

Cowbirds found in Canada and come of a cowbird. Only one for cowbirds. Some persons call them "cow blackbirds," others to the birds.

The baby cowbird took so much of the food that the little chipping sparrow egg hatched. The baby cowbird took so much of the food that the little chipping sparrow died from starvation three days later.

Down in Argentina there are cowbirds. They have relatives of the bay-winged cowbirds, and the relatives often lay eggs in the nests of the bay-winged cowbirds.
