In another old Greek game, the one of the women—the one who is winning at the moment.

A British soldier who watched this game being played many times at Salonika, Greece, described it to me in this way: Each player swings his closed fist twice. Then, on the count of three, he either opens his hand to spread out five fingers, holds his fingers clenched, or holds up two fingers.

The open hand means "paper."

the "scissors" sign is made by two

Both players are supposed to make a sign at the same moment.

If one shows "scissors" and the other "paper," the scissors win because scissors will cut paper.

If the signs for "scissors" and "stone" are made together, the stone wins because scissors can

One trouble with the game is fact that both players may make the same sign, which means a draw for that round. Also it is possible for a player to be not quite honest, and to make his sign a flicker of a second after the other; in this way he may be able to change his sign and win over his opponent.

Played honestly, however, there is fun in Scissors, Paper Stone. I played it with ar
