Bataks of Sumatra Use Wooden Figures As Guards for Dead

A riddle of a sort might be made up about certain berries which grow on the island of Sumatra. The riddle could run like this:

"What berries are first green, then red, then black?"

The answer is "berries of certain pepper plants."

Riddles commonly have a joke of some sort in the answer, but there is no joke about the pepper berries of which I speak. They appear on hundreds of thousands of plants in Sumatra, and the world used to get a large part of its pepper supply from them. For this reason Sumatra was called a "pepper pot." The ripe berries turn black after being picked and dried.

In the past few years, the Japanese in Sumatra must have cut down the amount of pepper raising there. If all the black and white pepper sent from the island in normal times had gone to Japan, the Japanese would have had too much of this spice around.

Pepper plants have been grown with success in Sumatra for several centuries. Pepper was one of the spices which led Columbus and other sea captains to try to reach the rich trading centers of India and the East Indies.

It is believed that Marco Polo was the first white man to see Sumatra. He lived two centuries before Columbus, and made a sea journey around the coast of southern Asia.

Since the time of Marco Polo, many thousands of white persons have visited Sumatra, and some of them have stayed there to live. Facts about native customs have been gathered in books.

Among the tribesmen on the island are the Bataks. These people live on the highlands in the north and have strange customs about their dead.

On a Batak coffin you may see a small wooden figure which
