Adler Sees Dane Profiting More in New Farm Plan

Dane county farms will benefit from the 1946 farm program more than in the past in meeting the most serious needs for soil building and water conserving measures, County Chairman Joseph C. Adler announced today.

Adler said that the new plan of operation adopted for next year will give the county and township chairmen more to say in deciding what practices should be emphasized in the county. He added that increased production in the county during the war has boosted the need for restoring and maintaining soil fertility and for other conservation measures.

Because farms available for farm program assistance are not sufficient to cover all the soil building and water conserving needs of either the nation or county, the new plan aims to use them as far as possible and for the practices where they will do the most good, Adler pointed out.

Under the plan the state committee will allocate to each county a definite sum of money as a 1946 farm budget. The county committee, in consultation with the farm-elected township committee men will then choose from an approved list the conservation practices most needed on the farms in this county. Next winter and spring the town committees will call upon each individual farmer and help him select approved practices most needed on his farm.

Survey Shows Butter Seldom Used for Soap

Reports that spoiled butter in large quantities has been sold to soap factories and rendering plants, thereby without foundation, the state department of agriculture revealed today after completion of a survey made by inspectors.

Director Milton H. Button of the department, announced that the personal check of the inspectors "reveals that receipts of spoiled butter are limited to an occasional pound or two turned in with other waste fats from stores or manufacturers."

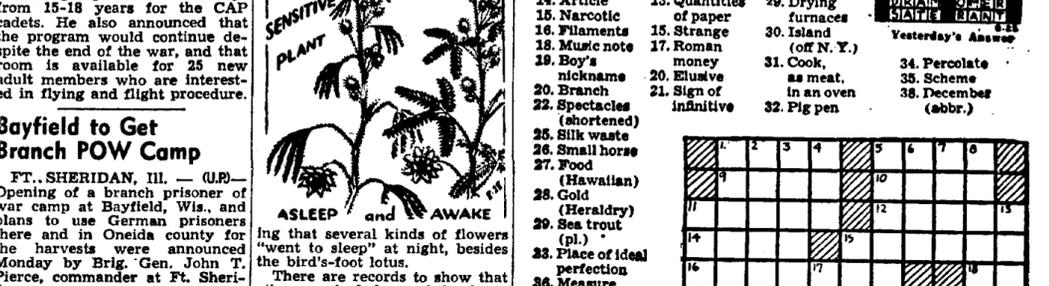

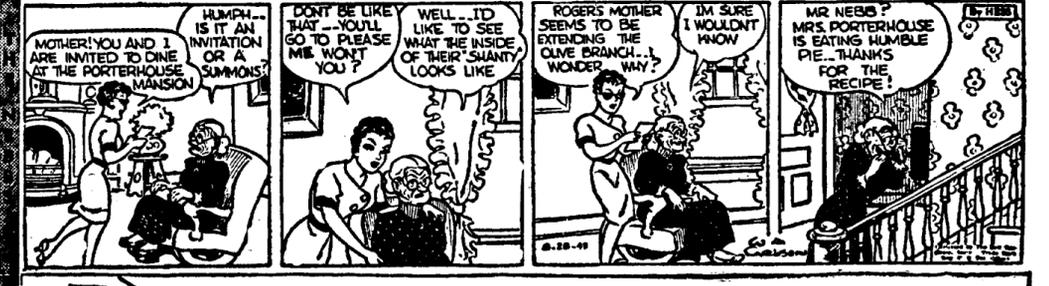

Button also added that in almost every instance the spoiled butter received had been contaminated in handling or as a result of coming in contact with extraneous matter.

SWEDISH PROFESSOR FOUND PROOF OF SLEEP IN SEVERAL FLOWERS

Two hundred years ago there lived in Sweden a man named Karl von Linne. He was a professor at the University of Upsala and is better known in history as "Linnaeus," the Latin form of his name.

Linnaeus, or von Linne, was interested in plants. He gave lectures on the subject, and used much of his free time to study them.

One night he strolled through a greenhouse at Upsala and, in the light of a torch, looked at a bird-foot lotus. Several hours before, he had seen the plant flowering, but now he rubbed his eyes. The blossoms were gone from sight! "Someone must have picked them," he exclaimed, and for a moment he felt angry. Then he studied the plant more closely, and found that the blossoms were hidden by leaves. In a sense, they had gone to sleep!

During the nights which followed, the professor made it a custom to walk amid the flowers in greenhouses and outdoor gardens. He was rewarded by learning that several kinds of flowers "went to sleep" at night, besides the bird-foot lotus.

There are records to show that other men had observed the sleeping of flowers before Linnaeus did so. Yet it seems that none of them had given such careful study to so many kinds.

Since flowers are without eyes, the question may be asked, "How can they sleep?" The answer is that certain animals sleep with their eyes open. Snakes, for example, are known for their habit of doing that.

Sleep is a state of rest, and it is possible for plants as well as animals to rest.

The mimosa, or "sensitive plant," is a good example of a plant which shows signs of sleeping. Its leaves fold together at night, and the bough droops.

There are about 400 kinds of mimosa plants, and they differ somewhat in their habits. Certain kinds are so sensitive that the touch of a human finger will make some of the leaves fold.

A few kinds of flowers go to sleep during the daytime. In morning glory is such a flower. In the early hours of the morning,
