Uncle Ray's Corner Crookes Tube Paved Way for X-Ray Machine

Sir William Crookes, a British scientist, played a part in the march of knowledge during modern times. Born in London in 1832, he lived to the age of 87. In his honor, the "Crookes tube" was was given its name.

The tube which Crookes invented was a glass bulb from which nearly all he air had been taken out. Entering the bulk at one end was a wire which carried electricity.

The Crookes tube helped to prepare the way for the modern neon tube. It also made it possible for scienists to carry out many tests.

When Crookes sent an electric current into the tube, rays, or electrons, jumred across the empty space to a piece of metal at the other end. A German scientist named Roentgen used a Crookes tube when he made tests which led to the x-ray machine. That was in 1895. Roentgen found that shadow pictures could be formed by the X rays, or "Roentgen rays," as they also are called.

Sir William Crookes

X rays are of great value to doctors who take care of people with broken bones. They also show dentists whether or not an abscess exists at the root of a tooth.

X ray machines, Crookes tubes and radium have done much to bring about the modern knowl-edge of atoms. All of them shoot out electrons, and electrons are parts of atoms.

When I say that those things "shoot" electrons, I am using the right word. A bullet may travel at the rate of half a mile in a second, but an electron travels at a

The electrons shot out by radium have speeds which are hard for the human mind to understand. Tests seem to have proved that they go (for a shot distance) at the rate of at least 50,000 miles a second! Some of them may equal the speed of light—186,000 miles a

Besides sending out electrons, radium shoots helium atoms into nearby space. These atoms travel less rapidly than the electrons, miles a second. their speed being about 10,000
