Peacetime Uses Expected Soon

By CHARLES CORDDRY (United Press Staff Correspondent) WASHINGTON—New radar developments and air-sea rescue plans promise to usher in an era of greater safety in civilian air travel. In a report on studies made at its Indianapolis experimental station, the Civil Aeronautics Administration said progress is such that "radar in some forms should be serving the airways within a matter of months."

At first radar will be used to combat airport traffic congestion, to prevent collisions, and to indicate distances from destinations or flight hazards, the report said. To Use Helicopters
The army air transport command disclosed meanwhile the or-44% ganization of a peacetime air-sea rescue service which will use helicopters and airborn motorboats to go to the aid of air disaster survivors.

A refinement of wartime developments, the rescue service even-tually will be worldwide in scope. ATC plans to use 100 helicopters at Atlantic bases and an equal number in the Pacific. The 40-passenger, 35-foot motor boats can be dropped to survivors from B-17 and B-29 bombers and C-54
