STRANGE CENSORSHIP

STRANGE indeed are the workings of the censorial mind. And none of recent memory is stranger than the mental process which evolved the decision to ban a Japanese newspaper editorial which informed the Japs that General MacArthur was not a living god, and counseled them to begin thinking of him as a symbol of democracy and not "the reincarnation of the Emperor Jimmu."

* This editorial first appeared in a paper bearing the fascinating name of Jiji Shimpo. The censors didn't mind its being printed for and read by the Japanese. But when it was translated into English and reprinted in the Nippon Times (whose circulation is largely among Allied occupation troops) the eccupation government put the lid on.

By the best American standards, the Japanese editorial was eminently sensible. It deplored the ancient and persistent Japanese habit of hero worship. It pointed out that many who think the American general the last word in human perfection had thought the same thing about Hitler. It cautioned that such thinking might lead to a search for a "superman" dictator, after General MacArthur's departure, who might revive the conditions and thinking that led Japan into the recent war.

Further, the newspaper gave its readers this pertinent definition and admonition: "Democracy means freedom. It asserts human rights and does not entail divine rights or the deification of personalities. If the conception that government is something imposed upon the people by an outstanding god, great man or leader is not rectified, democratic government is likely to be wrecked."

The only objection which we can conceive of, might be to this added piece of advice-but the objection would have to be on military rather than democratic grounds: "The way to express the gratitude of the Japanese people toward General MacArthur for the wisdom with which he is managing postwar Japan and for his efforts to democratize the nation is not to worship him as a god but to cast away the servile spirit and gain the selfrespect that would not bow its head to anybody."

Perhaps the occupation authorities prefer a servile people as being easier to manage. It may be that they think of themselves as conquerors rather than as educators who, for the good of world peace as well as of the Japanese, must lead the former enemy nation toward the enlightenment and sense of human dignity which are prerequisites of self-government.

We do not know that this is so. But we are reasonably sure that the Japs are also sudying the editorial and wondering at the reasons for keeping it out of the hands of the soldier-citizens of a democratic nation.

It could scarcely be hoped that whatever conclusion they reach would be flattering. And they might have a right to think that if it were not against occupation policy for a Japanese newspaper to preach democracy to its readers, at least it was against that policy to permit the occupation troops to know it.

The identity of the person who issued this censorship order is not revealed. Somehow it does not sound like the work of General MacArthur. But whoever is responsible seems not only to have committed a senseless error, but also to have hurt our effort to "sell" democracy to Japan at a time when, beyond the broader and more idealistic aspects of the program, it is decidedly to our national selfinterest to do a positive, effective job of salesmanship.
