Pursuit of Happiness

The Acquisitive Instinct "We had a phone call from Sandy Stuart today, Hubbard. He's on his way to college and wanted a talk with you." "Sorry to miss him, Isabelle. He's a grand kid. Anything special on his mind?" "No, I think not. He just wanted a little fatherly advice."

"I'm glad he's on his way. From what his mother said, I was afraid he would be stuck on the ranch for another year with no progress in his schooling. How did he manage to win his father around to let him go?" "He didn't. While his father was away, his two brothers got together and cooked up this scheme for him to go. Hubbard Hoover

Family Secrets And Children By ANGELO PATRI THERE are some things that should not be told to children, if it is at all possible to keep from them securely. Securely is the point of the matter. A child born out of wedlock is a child disgraced, according to the attitude of most people. It is too bad but it is so, and as such, a child is made to suffer severely for something he had nothing to do with. If we can first make sure that nobody will spring the truth on him and shock him beyond repair.

Adopted children should be told early in their association with their new parents that they were chosen to be their son or daughter. Beyond that bare fact, little else need be said. When they are old enough to ask questions about their birth, they are usually stable enough, secure enough in their home relationships, to be told such details as seem necessary.

Then there are the children who never saw their own fathers because they were killed in the war. Their mothers remarried and the child has a new father. It is always best to let the child know this even when he has been given his new father's name. Too many people know his history to keep the secret safe.

For such children some token of their father's being should be about their room—a picture of him, some personal belonging, so that the child learns, almost unconsciously, that he had a father other than the one he knows. This saves him from unconscious shock and allows him to stand on firm ground in family relationships.

And the children whose father is in jail, if that can be kept from them it is better so but there is usually some possibility of hiding the fact. In any case, it is not to be told them until they are old enough to understand the situation and to find comfort and strength in other sources. Such children need not only the friendly help of understanding men who, to the degree in their power, replace the fatherly care they miss otherwise. Life spares nobody, not even children, but we care with loving sympathy and understanding spare them some things.
