Q. Does the average family pay approximately one-fourth of its income for rent? This is the proportion that was formerly given in many books on budget-

A. There is not much statistical basis for this traditional statement, and it probably is true only when incomes are at an abnormally low level. The 1947 ratio was 12 per cent for non-farm families (be for etaxes). Low-income families (under $2000) spent slightly more than one-fifth of their total income on monthly rent payments in 1947, while high-income families ($5000 or over) spent just under one-tenth for rent. These figures are only a rough indication, however, because some rents were increased after the survey. There is not much statistiafter the survey.
