Eisenhower felt that to give up one of the landing beaches would threaten the success of the whole invasion; he had faith, too, in his air-borne troops. They were well trained and he felt that they could carry out their mission of breaking up the German rear lines with minimum losses to themselves.

His American commanders, among them Gen. Omar Nelson Bradley, had agreed with this view. They felt that the success of American air-borne landings the British air marshall's pessi-

Alone, in his tent, Eisenhower Alone, in his tent, Eisenhower came to his decision, to use his two divisions, the flower of American air-borne power, according to his own plan.

On the night they were to take off he went to the lolst Division himself and found the more in good shows. They include men in good shape. They joshed him and told him he had nothing to worry about.

"I stayed with them until the last of them were in the air, somewhere about midnight," Eisenhower wrote. A few hours later at his own headquarters he got word that the landing was successfully under way.

"Air Chief Marshall LeighMallory," he recalls, "was the

The air-horne divisions, two American and one British, were a decisive factor in the landings, as well as the subsequent hard fighting to hold the beachheads.

One history of the war says:
"It was the largest and most efficient air borne operation in five years of war. The Allied forces landed exactly as planned and plane losses ran to less than 3 per cent of those suffered by the Germans in Crete."
