Last week I reported that the new Broadway show, "Light Up the Sky," was fast and funny, the Sky," was fast and funny, and that on opening night the show people. On opening night, the wise-guy audience laughed fit to bust either because it was fit to bust, either because it was hep to Hart's Lilliputian libels or because it wanted the fel-low in the next seat to think it appeared, a friend told me he had seen the play and failed to note the hilarity I had hinted at. Puzzled, I decided to have another look, and so last night I sat through the Moss Hart show again.

Well, today it's my distressing duty to report that I was somewhat off base in my appraisal of the play. Last night, to my surprise, I found that the audience wasn't laughing very much

Could this be the same Hotshot
Harry who had given us "You Can't Take It With You?"
My answer is that it isn't, and to prove it I have evolved a theory about Moss which I call
"The Theory of the Hypersensitive Hyphen." Let me explain it.
As you may have heard, Mr.

As you may have heard, Mr. Hart, like a lot of other citizens As you may have heard, Mr. Hart, like a lot of other citizens on this mixed-up boulevard, has been in the habit of hitting a psychoanalyst's couch to get the short circuits taken out of his wiring. And it's my hunch that the kink which irked his id the most was the fact that his successes had all been collaborations—generally with the skillful and talented George S. Kaufman. This business of getting only 50 per cent of the by-lines kept gnawing away at Hart's ego, and finally he (or his analyst) got the idea that he'd never be happy until he got himself a by-line without a hyphen. And so he set out solo—with too little success.

so ne set out solo—with too littile success.

I talked to a well-known psychiatrist the other day about "Light Up the Sky" and asked him to tell me in language I could understand why Moss had committed this labor of libel—why he had put the whammy on some of his oldest friends.

"Don't get mad at him," advised the medico. "Hart can't help himself. Realizing his shortcomings as a writer, and not having a Kaufman or a war to fall back on, he's doing what tevery befuddled child does—teaning on the first prop that comes to hand. In this case, it can be a group of people whem he knows intimately

"In a strange way, the fact that these old friends may resent his unkind invasion of their privacy only makes it more attractive to him. This, we psychologists call 'self-destruction."
