locality, cherry for another and beech, holly or willow for others.

Sometimes the same stick is used continuously, at others one is cut when needed. In the attempt to discover water the diviner grasps a fork of the stick in each hand and with fingers turned upward holds the stick so that one fork is higher than the level of the hands. He wanders about at random waiting for the twig to twist suddenly downward, an indication that there is water underground. The value of the divining rod is not recognized by geologists.
