NEW YORK. (27) Old people are growing more important.

Every year there are more of them. Every year from now on there will be still more.

For despite its long foolishness the human race is living fair enough. Does anyone doubt politicians. They will become a tremendous pressure group for themselves. They will probably ask and get from the government more of what they want. And, in a democracy, that seems fair enough. Does anyone doubt that, if schoolchildren could yote, there would be more and better school buildings? better school buildings?

Old people also are getting more important to the medical profession. Having cut the birth mortality pretty much to a minimortality pretty much to a liminary mum, the doctors now find that diphtheria and the whooping cough are taking less of their time than hardening of the arteries and that ancient misery —"my rheumatiz."

Many physicians are specializing in the new science of geron-tology—the study of old age.

And they have found it isn't enough for old people merely to be of some economic importance to others. They have to be made to feel still important to themselves.

And that's a problem. Their pride and self-confidence suffers a terrific blow when they realize they have passed the peak of their powers. As Dr. Martin Gumpert told the gerontological society here last week, the self-realization of aging is "perhaps the most profound shock of our lifespan—next to dying."
