Bacteria May Be Tried in Fight Against Leukemia

By FRANK CAREY

MEMPHIS, Feb. 26. A medical variety of fighting fire with fire was suggested today as a possible new means to combat leukemia, a cancerous condition of white blood cells. Dr. Lowell A. Erf proposed subjecting leukemic sufferers 'mild' infections of such virus diseases as influenza and chicken pox-on the theory that the viruses would feed upon, and thus check further development of the leukemic cells. The Philadelphia scientist said & cases have been observed where cases have been observed where leukemia sufferers lost all symp. Furthermore, he told a national cancer conference sponsored by the American Cancer Society and the National Cancer Institute, this fact has been learned:

That in experimental animals "there are certain bacteria and viruses that grow only in malignant (cancerous) tissues and will not grow in normal tissues presumably because the right nutrient materials are not available."

Urging cancer researchers to consider such a line of attack, Dr. Erf suggested that "a virus or bacterium might be found that will grown in only lankamin."
