

A play that might have been a thoroughly enjoyable comedy about early Wisconsin life was reduced to somewhat tedious farce Monday night.

Whether it was the fault of the writers, Robert Gard and Dore Reich, or the director, Jonathan Chrysin is head the core, Jonathan These performances, coupled Reich, or the director, Jonathan Curvin, is hard to say.

Certainly none of the blame can be laid to the hard-working members of Wisconsin Players who comprised the cast of "River Boat," presented in the Wisconsin Union theater.

It was their efforts, rather than the wisconsin the player than the show moving.

Show owner.

These performances, coupled with the specialties of William Francis, Mary Snee, N an c.y. Roberts, Miss Zimney, and unmend others, were what kept the show moving.

With the talent at hand—in writing, in directing, in acting—it's too bad that "River Boat" didn't come up to what we have Union theater.

It was their efforts, rather than the play itself, which gave the offering its entertainment value—and certainly it was most amusing in many places.

The played dragged at the beginning, then went to the other extreme at the end, with the playwrights piling farcical climax unto exhaustion.

Writing, in directing, in acting—it's too bad that "River Boat" didn't come up to what we have learned to expect from all the people involved in its production.

The show will be repeated at 8 each night through Saturday.

City Employes to Take Pay Cut at West Allis

The plot was about a boat on the Fox river threatened with extinction by the machinations of an evil. evil railroad man who coveted the captain's wife. The wife a former actress, persuaded her husband to give asylum to a medicine show troupe, whose performance raised enough money to huv the boat's passage through the Portage locks. Meanwhile, she thwarted the evil man completely: her step-daughter got her man: the actors got a contract, and a mule got drunk.

man: the actors got a contract, and a mule got drunk.

Into the proceedings, the writers introduced a medicine show which included some of the worst gags ever perpetrated (most of them. I am afraid, authentic minstrel jokes of the 770s), some first-class dancing, and some songs and magic. and some songs and magic.

In fact, as the play progressed, one found that the writers had used every trick in the bag, from moving scenery to histrionics which, praise be, are now history except in intentional burlesques of the kind Curvin et al presented.

Let it be said that writers and directors had captured the lines and the mannerisms of the period and then had broadened them for laughs. Costuming was good, too.

and then had broadened them for laughs. Costuming was good, too, except for some modern sports shoes on the medicine show's strong man.

And Marjorie Schaffer, as the william, and Ruth Zimney, as a simpering soprano, gave first-rate performances, followed closely by dependence."
