Victor offers a topnotch album, too, in Alexander Brailowsky's playing of Chopin's first piano concerto. Here is a pianist who can make almost anybody like Chopin, and these records almost breathe when Brailowsky is playing. William Steinberg conducts the orchestra, and does as well as possible with the material.

Columbia presents a new, and powerful, recording of Beethoven's ninth ("Choral") symphony by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, the Westminster choir, and soloists under Bruno Walter. The performance gives a boost to those who onsider Walter the greatest living interpreter of Beethoven. He builds up the dynamic work into a tremendous, moving finish. As one reviewer said of his interpretation, "Walter's typical line is undeviatingly straight. It broadens as it goes . . . The power is accumulative, the result is inescapable."

Of the soloists, Elena Nikolaidi comes through best; comparatively new to America, the Greek contralto reveals a voice that will keep her here long enough to bring her to Madison, we hope. The choir is not quite so good as Shaw's was on the Koussevitzky recording a year and a half ago, but only by a shade.

Speaking of Koussevitzky, you'll be glad to know that Victor offers him and the Boston Symphony orchestra in Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony. It has been recorded almost too often, but this is a version worth having.
