dom and gaiety you could want in

A group of 16th-century motets introduced the choir, and in them the precision of its training was most marked. The voices seemed small until one became accustomed to them. Not once did they make the mistake of forcing themselves into producing greater volume; they let the audience adjust its ears to the voices. Thus was pre-served the naturalness which was one of the choir's greatest attrifamiliar "Lasco Chio Pianga" by Handel closed the first segment.

The group was a remarkable collection of voices; and as great, in too, but mainly they were best in its own way, as was the early Don the ensembles. Here, the whole Cossack chorus—natural in its simplicity and youthful appeal, as the sion and the micrometer-fine bal-Cossacks were in their complexi-ance of its sections under the direction of Harold Hedding.

Among the boys were two sopranos of striking beauty, pure and sweet in quality, accurate in intonation, and precise in time. One as they sang. But offstage the story of them played the heroine in was different. The youngsters tore
