PURDUE at WISCONSIN

FREQUENT

Bill Doudna's Gunnar

TIP O' THE MORNING: Because of Albert Rahier's illness, the first concert in the University of Wisconsin Schoenberg series will be shorter than planned. The second violinist of the Pro Arte quartet has a severe cold, so the quartet will not appear. Profs. Gunnar Johansen and Leo Steffens will play their scheduled part of the program.

The flashing fingers and sensitive spirit of Gunnar Johansen combined to make an intriguing program at the Wisconsin Union theater

Johansen opened the afternoon with a chaste performance of Bach's "Toccata in D Major," so clear and definitive that one thought at once of a harpsichord to which had been added a touch of the piano's warmth. The same impression was evoked by the two Scarlatti sonatas which followed the Bach work.

The same clarity—a typical Johansen attribute— pérvaded the first two movements of Beethoven's "Sonata in A Flat Major."

(Hmmm— You should be that and they goo nearly $75,000.000,000 of business each year.

It asserted that $624,334,000 in taxes could be collected from coops, building and loan associations, mutual savings banks, post extending the tax is not only a left-over wartime measure, but that its discriminatory, and an unfair penalty on the tax is not only a left-over wartime measure, but that its discriminatory, and an unfair penalty on the first two movements of Beethoven's "Sonata in A Flat Major."

hansen attribute — pervaded the first two movements of Beethoven's "Sonata in A Flat Major." The pianist went completely dramatic in the third section, the funeral march, thereby adding sense of heaviness to the playing. But in the closing rondo he regained the crystalline quality.

After a flamboyant playing of Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," which somehow didn't sound like Johansen at all, the pianist delivered a brilliant performance of Liszt's six Paganini caprices, with flying fingers tracing lively melodies at one time, and with virile hands sounding crashing chords at another.

The next Sunday Music hour, Mar. 19, will bring the University Symphony cyneketrs to the heavest.
