

The Sunday Spotlight: A Guest Column

Harrison Canvases Exhibited

By JOHN F. KIENZT
Chairman of the University of Wisconsin Department of Art History and Criticism
Madison's lack of an attractive and suitable gallery for the showing of works of art is made more apparent than ever by the exhibition of the paintings of Mark Harrison currently on the walls of the main floor of the State Historical Society building.

pupil did a great deal with diorama painting and this brought him to grave, tragic results and a temporary divorce from painting.
A fire in a theater where his dioramas were on display destroyed all of the sketches he had brought with him from England, ideas for further painting, and whatever finished canvases he then had in his studio.

Icelanders Need Electricity

The little country called Iceland was one of the "stepping stones" used by Norsemen before the discovery of North America. First they settled in Iceland, then in Greenland, then in a place which is believed to have been part of the mainland of North America.

The republic of Iceland has forests of low trees, most of them not rising above the height of 12 or 15 feet. The trees are mainly dwarf birches and mountain oaks. Because fuel is hard to obtain, the people of Iceland have had to find ways to keep warm without burning much wood or coal.
