

The Orbits

By William Juhre

TIP O' THE MORNING: At last report, the Wisconsin Union theater still had some mighty good seats for the Alec Templeton concert Tuesday night.

Gunnar Johansen's adventure in the abstract, "Pastorale for Orchestra, Piano, and Recorders," received its first performance Sunday in the Wisconsin Union theater before a near-capacity audience which granted it applause that was more than polite but less than ecstatic.

Much of the work was worth more than that. It was carefully constructed from fresh material, skillfully decorated with figures of original design.

Its faults, on first hearing, appeared to be two: an over-elaboration of some of the structure, noticeable particularly in the last of three sections given to the recorders, and occasional ventures in sudden contrasts.

Use of the recorder—an antique flute—to help express the pastoral atmosphere was an inspiration in itself. As Johansen said in a program note, it has "a tone color and timbre irresistibly woody."

The second movement, divided into three "eclogues," was played by these instruments—first one, then two, then three. The alto and tenor recorders succeeded admirably in their purpose, but the soprano had a quality more reminiscent of a small boy's whistling than of the desired effect.

Perhaps the atmosphere of theatricality which the work was staged served to detract from, rather than add to, its total effect. Lights were dimmed after the first movement, and the recorders were played from a point in the auditorium.

The concert opened with the color-packed overture to Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini," in which the woodwinds starred. The second part of the program was spent on Brahms' second symphony, the first half of which was played with a high degree of skill; the orchestra seemed to tire toward the end, and there were some pretty erratic passages.

Theodore Kulis, horn, and Esther Sadovnik, oboe, deserve special credit for their work in the second movement.

AT WAUKESHA: Bettina Bjorksten, Madison soprano, will be soloist with the Waukesha Symphony orchestra at its next concert, Tuesday night, Mar. 28, in the
