Gordon learned to love musice early in life because it was a chief source of recreation in his home. The MacRaes formed a family orchestra—mother playing the plano, sister the violin, Gordon took lessons on the clarinet, Gordon took lessons on the plano, saxophone and mellowphone. Somehow, though, he never thought of taking up singing.

However, when young MacRae was working as a page at NBC in New York, Horace Heidt overheard him singing to himself and offered him a job with his band. Gordon then decided that a singing career was for him, and being career was for him, and being career was for him, and being a to seize on every opportunity to train his voice.

Regardless of how successful he is, no singer ever feels he's had enough training. Gordon still intends to find time for some concentrated coaching on the finer points. However, most NBC listeners, who find little to criticize in the quality of his "Railroad Hour" renditions, feel that such a project might well be post-poned indefinitely.

An old adage is gradually taking the lieves that West has more than four clubs, he must try to win finesses in spades and diamonds. If it turns out that clubs actually are 44, South can afford to lose one of his two finesses.
