Outguessing Finesse May Give One Mental Workout

By OSWALD JACOBY

"WHEN this hand was played in a rubber bridge game at our club recently," writes a Richmond fan, "declarer took a long time out for thought at one point. This puzzled me, as I shall soon explain. West opened the king of spades, and South won with the ace. South then drew two rounds of trumps, West continued with a spade. South continued with a third round of trumps, and West discarded another spade. East discarded the deuce of diamonds. Declarer cashed the top clubs and led his remaining queen of spades, and led back the queen of spades. East discarded a club on the third round of spades. After South had ruffed the third round of spades, he led the rest of his trumps. Both defenders discarded their clubs on these tricks. At this point it was clear that each hand held three diamonds, and South had to guess which defender had the queen in order to make his slam. This particular player does not put on an act when he plays bridge, but on this occasion he sat and thought for three and a half minutes before making a play. It seemed like a year!

"What can a player find to think about all that time?" If East is a poor player, there is no problem. His discard of the deuce of diamonds should indicate that he does not hold the queen of that suit. If East is a good player, he might discard the deuce of diamonds if he thinks that South considers him a poor player. If South and East know each other to be good players, East would not discard a diamond no matter what he held. It is obvious that a club discard must be safe, so South would know that a diamond discard meant money business. He would probably see quite clearly that East actually held the queen of diamonds if East happened to be a really great bridge player, he might discard a diamond from a worthless holding. The idea would be to persuade South that East was trying to disguise a strong diamond holding. If you think that this is now becoming very complicated, I will agree with you. I think you will have to agree with me, however, that South has plenty to think about. He must decide how good East is, as a starter. From there he must go on to such delicate matters as East's opinion of South, and East's opinion of South's opinion of East. See what I mean? My own practice, however, is to make such decisions very quickly. If I think too long, I tend to out-guess myself.

Klocksier Thanks His Supporters

Councilman Herbert R. Klocksier, who won the Republican nomination for Assemblyman from the 11st District, today expressed his thanks to all those who voted for him and otherwise aided him in his primary campaign. Similar sentiments were expressed by Councilman Clarence E. Wagner, candidate for election to the County Board of Supervisors from the First District. Wagner, although he was top man in Long Beach, lost to Supervisor W. A. Smith, incumbent, and Herbert C. Legg, in the area outside the city, which wiped out his local gains.

L. B. Port Manager Visits in Naples

A postcard received here today from Port of Long Beach Manager E. J. Amar discloses that he was at Naples earlier this week. Amar said he had a press conference at Naples with a number of reporters, including men from England's Reuters and the Associated Press. "Government, state and city officials have been very co-operative and are very much interested in our port," Amar wrote. He and members of his family are on a five-months tour of Europe.

Chicken Wins Fame, Saves Own Neck

NBC's "Dragnet," which goes in for realism in a big way, used a real live chicken to cluck in the background during a barnyard sequence on a recent program. After the show, the chicken was awarded to Soundman Bud Tollefson who earmarked it for a Sunday dinner. However, the Tollefsons have grown fond of the fowl that they can't bear the thought of dining at its expense. The chicken is still alive and clucking "realistically" in their back yard.
