Ghost Show Guards Broadcast

By WILLIAM L. DOUDNA (State Journal Radio Editor) Big-time radio doesn't take any chances, especially with Midwestern weather.

PAUL LAVALLE

Paul Lavalle's 48-piece "Band of America" broadcast Monday night from the Chicago Fair of 1950, playing on an outdoor stage with no canopy.

But, sitting under the protecting roof of the grandstand, I wondered what the network would do if the rain became torrential — so had the concert couldn't go on.

Would Lavalle and his men flee, leaving the air empty? Was NBC keeping a standby show ready — just in case? Or would the local outlets have to fill in the time?

Nobody else seemed to be worried. They knew.

Before the band left New York by chartered plane, it had recorded a 30-minute program, complete with the sponsor's ads.

In New York, engineers started spinning the disc as soon as the live show hit the air in Chicago.

Naturally, the sound from the record wasn't sent out of the studios. However, rain or anything else had stopped the band in Chicago, the New York engineers would have turned a knob, and the recorded show would have gone out on the network without a noticeable break — and the show would have ended right on time, as network programs must.

Such a provision against accident cost the network almost as much money as the living show — and, since the record didn't have to be used Monday night, it never will be used.

The worry it saved was worth it. Lavalle made a name for himself in other varieties of music before he organized the "Band of America."

He was the first conductor of the "Chamber Music Society of Lower Basin Street," the Dixieland jazz program which gave Dinah Shore her start.

Before that, he had been a clarinet and saxophone soloist with both dance and symphonic orchestras.

Then he founded the Stradivari orchestra, most of whose instruments were genuine products of Antonio Stradivari's Cremona workshop. After that Lavalle conducted the "Highways of Melody" program for his present sponsor. He has two special reasons for liking band music, he said in Chicago last week.

One of them is the community spirit that band music typifies; the other is the contact it gives him with young musicians.

"I love to work with those high school boys and girls," he said. "Just standing in front of them as they wait for you to start them off gives you a deep emotional thrill."

Lavalle is enthusiastic about such work as that done in Madison by the University of Wisconsin music clinic, and about the kind of festivals sponsored by the Wisconsin School Music Assn. His interest is reflected in the way he tries to meet requests to play music chosen for festival and clinic work.

"I get many letters asking us to play these pieces on the air," he said, "and we're always anxious to do them. Yes — we play them just as they're written, without any special dressing-up."

The boys and girls like them that way. When they know in advance that we're going to do one of their numbers, they will follow the parts on their own music.

In fact, I had a letter from one boy who thanked us for accenting a certain piece of music exactly as he had been taught in his high school band."

Lavalle has played several selections at the request of Wisconsin musicians. Obviously, the band can't meet all these requests, so Lavalle chooses those most generally sought.

So far, the conductor has had little time to visit schools, but wants to do more.
