Three fine musicians cooperated at Music hall Wednesday night to bring a program of chamber music to an enthusiastic audience that port nearly filled the place. They were Leo Steffens, pianist, professor of music in the University of Wisconviolin lost the sheen which marked sin music school; Emil Heermann, violin lost the sneen with the tranquil sections, violinist, of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, and Walter Heermann, cellist, conductor of the South American cellist who now Madison Civic Symphony orches-lives in Chicago and who fre-tra.

They played two trios—Beethoven's Opus 70, No. 1 and Tschairman and Tschairm kowsky's only such work. Two compositions of variance would be hard to find without going into contemporary literature. The Beethoven trio is structurally classic; the Tschaikowsky has a sonata-form first movement, but its second is a set of variations and its third another variation with a tragic coda.

The Russian composer never felt quite at home writing for small groups, and this work shows itthe music fairly cries for an orchestra. The Beethoven trio, conversely, is made up largely of almost intimate interplays among rid the instruments.

The trio played with a strong feeling for balance except in for-tissimo passages, when Steffens tended to outnumber his two com-
