GENUINE LABOR OF LOVE

People's Lobbyist Not Getting Rich

By HARMAN W. NICHOLS

WASHINGTON, Aug. 14. (AP) Being a lobbyist in Washington can make a man rich or keep him poor.

Old Ben Marsh is just as happy staying poor as a one-man lobby for the people.

Old Ben is pushing 74. Most of his hair is gone and what is left hangs in white strings over his ears. His office in the Le Droit Building looks like a country weekly; Ben himself looks like the editor.

This is a labor of love, he'll tell you.

Officially, Marsh is the head of the People's Lobby, Inc. Counting time off for a couple of wars, the first one in 1912 over in the Balkans, Ben has been lobbying for the little fellow for nearly half a century. Matter of fact, he's writing a book about it to be called "Fifty Years of Lobbying."

Ben claims that he fights for the "old folks and the guys who can't get a raise."

"I represent the people who are going to be the balance of power in times to come," he said, "and he's not looked upon as a crackpot."

His theme now, in the days of cold-war is what it always has been: pay-as-you-go.

In his latest news letter to the people he wrote:

"On June 25, 'the ides of Korea,' government and nongovernment debt was about $600 million. National wealth was around two-thirds that much. Consumer debt was at a peak, and home mortgage credit made foreclosure a cinch. To pay even the current interest on the national debt would take 1,100,000,000 days at $5 a day."

Ben works for the people because he likes people.

He couldn't keep a Ford moving on what he makes.

He couldn't even begin to buy bread, take streetcars to the Capitol and belong to the National Press Club on the "salary" he gets. The lobby supports his office and his secretary—the entire staff—by subscription. Ben, himself, lives on a small private income from annuities.

"My secretary," he said, "makes a lot more than I do."
