TIP O' THE MORNING: At last reports, Buddy Rich was seriously ill in the Long Beach, Calif., Veterans hospital. A friend says that mail from his once-devoted fans would cheer the former band leader greatly.

Set in scenic grandeur, "Broken Arrow" has something of human grandeur, too. Two men—a former American scout and an Indian chief — decide to do something about peace between their peoples, and on the whole, succeed.

James Stewart plays Tom Jeffers, the scout who believes that the Apaches would listen to a sincere plea for peace and risks his life to meet their chief, Cochise (played by Jeff Chandler.)

The men find common ground, and labor upon it to end western warfare. Smoldering suspicions flare into open flame, but are quenched by the honesty of the pair.

Incidentally, Jeffers falls in love with an Indian girl, portrayed by the diminutive Debra Paget, but their love ends in tragedy.

Besides the story and the quiet sincerity of Stewart's and Chandler's acting, the film has much to recommend it—fine color photography, a vast number of small parts played well, scenes of tenseness which grow into restrained but effective suspense, and, above all, the thesis that the Indians had some rights on their own land, after all.

STAGE TO SCREEN: Recent word from Hollywood tells of the casting of several actors who have been at the Parkway theater in stage productions. For example:

Lon Chaney, Jr. ("Born Yesterday") in "Only the Valiant."

Phyllis Thaxter ("Claudia") in "Jim Thorpe—All-American."

Carl Benton Reid "Papa Is All" and "The Little Foxes") in "The Flying Missile."
