That's one conclusion to be drawn from the experience of History

Prof. Robert Reynolds of the University of Wisconsin, recently returned from two semesters of research through ancient documents in Genoa, Italy.

In 1948, Reynolds, Byrne, and photostat, plus samples from the Krueger were elected to honorary the continuing in Genoa, Italy.

Reynolds went to Genoa on a Fulbright fellowship to work toward efforts to uncover a vital corner his long-time goal: Taking the guess-work out of the economic history of history.

"Another notary astounded us son. by doodling in Arabic numerals.
We had thought that no one in We had thought that no one in Italy then used anything but the Roman figures," he continues. These documents were known to exist for a hundred years before Eugene Byrne, then a graduate student in history at Wisconsin, started work on them in 1913. They had been by-passed by scholars, not only because they were buried in the archives of an ancient building but because the hand-writing script is difficult to read.

After World War 1, Byrne traveled back to Genoa on a university research grant with a photostatic camera for making copies of the documents. Some of these copies show charred edges from the fire set by Louis XIV when he attacked the city.

Find Problem Child "It seems that the boy was a problem child from an early age," Reynolds says. "As a schoolboy he played hookey and got into all kinds of jams, which were just curtain-raisers for what followed. He foined a force of mercenary soldiers, was captured by the enemy, and ransomed by his father." Whereupon he came and robbed his father's house.

"Father arranged a marriage with a nice local girl, but shortly after the wedding the boy ran off to Sicily and married another girl. On his next visit home he had words with his mother, pulled documents.
