French Turn a Good Ear

By WILLIAM L. DOUDNA

French and American listening habits differ as much as French and American speech, temperament, and talking habits, one learns from Prof. Germaine Mercier, who spent the summer in her native France studying how the French listen, and to what.

(Mlle. Mercier will report on her findings fully when she speaks at the annual fall conference of the Wisconsin Association for Better Radio and Television in Madison on Thursday).

For one thing, the French concentrate on their radio programs, unlike the average American listener. When there's a concert, he devotes himself to the music, and doesn't use it as a background for conversation. When there's a dis-cussion, he just listens. When cussion, he just listens. When there's news, ditto. If the French listener doesn't intend to devote himself wholly to the broadcast, he shuts off the radio, Mile. Mercier says. And this applies to women's daytime listening, too.

"You don't find a French housewife just letting her radio play while she works or answers the telephone," she reports.

Even "le jazz hot" gets concentrated listening, although the voluble jazz enthusiast may be found discussing the music as it goes along—but with an intellectual approach to it.

"And there is much good jazz on French radio stations," Mlle. Mercier says.

As for news broadcasts . . . There just isn't any field for commentators. The French like their news straight and unadulterated "The loser has his choice after that. Therefore, with personal viewpoint, or even national ones. the loser has two choices. French like their news straight and unadulterated They want to make up their own minds. Discussion programs are much freer than in the United States, Mile, Mercier says, with fewer restrictions on what can be said on the air—despite the fact that almost all stations are state-owned.
